

KUHF-FM Houston Public Radio, NPR Houston – 5 September 2007

Researchers at Rice University and Singapore's Nanyang Technological University are forming the $2.6-million Institute for Sustainable Nanoelectronics, hoping to slash design and production costs for embedded microchips. A major goal of the collaboration is to tie costs for design, energy consumption and production to the value that the computed information has for the user.