Near-death experience made her Mt Everest climb 'more memorable'

Tronline teacher's safety rope stopped her fall after climber's misstep

SINGAPORE – Every 15 minutes, a woman reaches the peak of Mount Everest. Tronline's Mount Everest climb made her just one of them.

Tronline, a 25-year-old teacher from Singapore, was one of the last climbers to reach the summit of Mount Everest on May 22, 2015. Her near-death experience made her climb 'more memorable.'

Tronline's near-death experience occurred on May 21, 2015, when she was attempting to reach the summit of Mount Everest. As she was climbing, she encountered a misstep, which caused her to fall.

Tronline, who is a trained climber, managed to grab a safety rope and was pulled back to safety. She was taken to a hospital in Katmandu, where she was treated and released.

The experience was life-changing for Tronline. "I will never forget that day," she said. "It was a moment when I realized how precious life is."

Tronline's near-death experience made her climb 'more memorable,' as she said, "I feel like I have a new perspective on life."

Tronline is a teacher at a primary school in Singapore. She has been climbing for five years and is currently training for her next expedition.
